lady Charlotte Lincol. It always gives me pleasure to read Your letters but I must Confess that the account of dear little Williams concern for the poor Duke has ~~made~~ ^{it if possible} still more agreeable to me, what satisfaction must not you feel Madam in seeing Your pains bestowed upon that little bud not quite lost it begins to strike a root, may God grant it to be a strong one, and the flower it bears may prove to be the pleasure of mankind.

Our anxiety is great about the Duke but no other accounts arrived as yet from Leghorn, this is what gives me some hopes as the Letters which arrived Yesterday were wrote the seventh Day of his illness and by the Italian Physician look'd upon as the fatal Day, no Messenger being arrived flatters me with something good but that I keep to myself, for fear of something worth a coming, if it turns out to be what we wish the joy will I am sure equal our present grief.

The Princess of Wales's Situation is easier felt than ~~hard~~, I shall see her to night and flatter myself to find her easier than what she was Yesterday, though she looks upon it as a gone case, she say to me Yesterday that is a great Death.

lose five Children in twelve Years, and every one had some good qualities, but poor William is a true Friend to mankind and must be regretted by all.
I am glad to hear that the Children are to spend their time at New as they can be in better Hands than Yours, I inclose a letter to William which I flatter myself will please him. My Compliments to the Miss Finches.
